James Davis House
Cabin Creek (site)
c. 1840
Private

The James Davis house, also identified as the Theophilus Mowbray house or the Alfred Frosch house, was a distinctive story-and-a-half frame structure that stood on the east side of the county road within the former mill village of Cabin Creek. Abandoned and deteriorating by the early 1970s, the house appears to have dated from the second quarter of the nineteenth century due to architectural features recorded before its demolition. The story-and-a-half, three-bay structure was unusual for its double pile or two-room depth, and exterior brick chimneys defined each gable end. Six-over-six or a few four-over-four sash windows, typical for the period, lighted the first and second floors. The steeply pitched gable roof was marked by a pair of gable roofed dormers fitted with six-over-six sash windows that were framed by unusual molded surrounds. The side hall plan dwelling extended to the rear with a single-story kitchen wing.

The land record research for this property traces the title of this lot back to the mid nineteenth century ownership of James Davis, who purchased portions of "Hope," "Medford's Chance" and the "Mill land" during the mid to late 1840s. Following the Civil War and by the time the Lake, Griffing, and Stevenson atlas was published in 1877, the house was occupied by Theophilus Mowbray and his wife Angeline, who had inherited title to the house and acreage from her father Ezekial Williams. Theophius and Angeline Mowbray resided in the house through the early decades of the twentieth century. In August 1920, Angeline, then a widow, sold the property to W. Hamilton Spedden and Jacob H. Waller, and the transfer identified the land as the "Davis or Medford lands, Lot 1, late residence of Theophilus Mowbray." The last principal owners, Alfred and Mildred Frosch, held title to the story-and-a-half frame house with 90 acres between 1944 and 1979.

Prepare both a one paragraph summary and a comprehensive description of the resource and its various elements as it exists today.

The Frosch farmhouse, historically known as the Theophilus Mowbray house, or the James Davis house, was a story-and-a-half, side hall/double-pile plan frame structure that stood at the location of a modern house now identified as 6311 East New Market-Ellwood Road in the community of Cabin Creek, Dorchester County, Maryland. The house stood unoccupied and in deteriorating condition when the structure was recorded in 1971 by Michael Bourne when he added it to the Maryland Inventory of Historic Properties. Efforts were made to save the structure during the 1970s and 1980s, but it was ultimately demolished and the land was subdivided.

The story-and-a-half side hall/double pile frame dwelling appears to have dated from the second quarter of the nineteenth century. Pilaster detailing characteristic of the Greek Revival style defined the front entrance and gable roofed dormers, although the description written during the mid 1970s labeled them as only as "odd." Wide pine floor boards were another feature of the house remembered by the across the street neighbors.

The story-and-a-half, three-bay, double pile frame dwelling was supported on a low brick foundation, and the exterior was clad with weatherboard siding. The steeply pitched gable roof, marked by a pair of gable roofed dormers, was sheathed with wood shingles. Sheltering the three-bay front wall was a shed roofed porch supported on square posts. The first and second floors were lighted by mostly by six-over-six sash windows, however a few four-over-four sash were used as well. Rising on the south gable end but set forward off center to the gable as an exterior brick chimney stack marked by corbelled shoulders and a single flue stack. The gable end was flush and trimmed with a molded bargeboard that met a boxed cornice at the base of the roof. The main block extended to the back with a single-story service wing designed with an unusual south side inset corner pierced by a door. The three-bay kitchen was served by a centrally located brick chimney.

DESCRIBE THE PRESENT AND ORIGINAL (if known) PHYSICAL APPEARANCE

Frosch Farmhouse is one of the most interesting buildings in the area north of East New Market. It is a one and one-half story frame structure with a one story addition on the back. The front portion has a leanto roof, a side entrance and two windows on the facade and two dormers above. The windows have 6/6 sash and both the door and dormers have odd pilasters. On both gables is a chimney, not symmetrically placed. The south gable has a 4/4 sash window on the west side of the chimney with a door and window on the east side, a window on the second story and a small casement in the attic.

A hood covers another door and window, adjacent the main body of the house, which is an extension of the off-set kitchen. The kitchen itself has a center door and two windows. There is a chimney in the center of the roof of the kitchen.

Presently the house is having a temporary roof installed by interested parties.

STATEMENT OF SIGNIFICANCE

Frosch Farmhouse is an important early 19th century structure in the area. Few two-room deep houses of this style exist in the county. In form it is more typical of Southern Maryland, though some of the features are absolutely unique.

Could this have been the home of the miller who operated the Upper Cabin Creek mill? If so, it is important as the home of a miller.
